

McWHINNEY FOUNDATION

THE LEGEND & THE LEGACY

Under the vigilant eye of the tallest cottonwood at the edge of the creek, John Hahn diligently toiled to till the soil and plant his first crop of sugar beets and hay.

In 1860 John Hahn, pioneer and homesteader, tended his land east of what one day would become Loveland, Colorado. With hard work, time and a strong set of values to serve as his foundation, he built a home, cared for his family and helped create a community.

Little did he know that over 100 years later his great, great grandsons Chad and Troy McWhinney, with an equally strong set of values serving as their foundation, would diligently work the same land, with the same purpose, to build homes, care for families and create a community.

John Hahn's legacy has been passed on, as have the values that inspired his efforts. The vigilant cottonwood, now too, over 100 years old, having sunk its roots deep in the Colorado soil and with its limbs lifted skyward, continues to remind us that when your roots go deep, the sky is the limit.
